pay tipping fees quarterly, relieving some of the pressure.

Mr. Bradshaw said he expected the county would have to borrow money to operate the first year, but that he would research the options and report back. He added that the county might go after a subsidy from some of the extra money in the state budget.

In the meantime, the board is continuing to try to find a local site suitable for a landfill. All the sites it has recommended so far have been rejected by the State Department of Wildlife management as important wildlife habitat. Commissioner Duke has made the point that two-thirds of Wasatch County land is owned by government agencies, which doesn't leave much available for a landfill. County Attorney Steve Hansen is investigating possibilities for going after a government-held site through the court system.

Commissioner Duke reported that Val Draper, a board member who was excused from the meeting, had volunteered to present the problem and request support from the governor and other state representatives during the county Republican convention.
